

The European Holocaust Research Infrastructure (EHRI) project, launched on 16 November 2010 in Brussels

, is a €7m EU-funded project that aims to provide open access to Holocaust material such as documents, objects, photos, film and art from around Europe and elsewhere. It involves 20 partner organisations in 13 countries, making it the most important European research project about the Holocaust to date.

EHRI will be an example and forerunner for digital research in a wide range of new disciplines in historical research and archival practices.

Some EHRI partners are also integrally involved in DARIAH, and there are expected to be significant overlaps between the two projects in terms of technological and strategic approaches to research infrastructure development. The aim is to create a cohesive body of integrated research materials that will be made available online to the public.

EHRI is coordinated by NIOD, the Institute for War, Holocaust and Genocide studies in Amsterdam.

Read more about EHRI at the European Holocaust Research Infrastructure website.